Dulles Visiting SisterCIA Does Not Make Policy, Ex-Chief Notes

The Central Intelligence Agency's role in the turbulent politics of South Viet Nam depends strictly upon policies laid down by President Kennedy and Secretary of State Rusk, the former chief of the CIA said in Utica yesterday.

Allen W. Dulles, CIA director from 1953 to 1961, was in the city visiting his brother-in-law, sister, Mr. and Mrs. James J. Dulles, 15 Lowell Dr., New York.

Dulles, brother of the late Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, said it might be possible that the CIA would perform an operational function in the replacement of South Viet Nam President Ngo Dinh Diem if the "political people" wanted it.

False Impression
"The CIA only carries out policies mandated by the President and secretary of state," Dulles said. "I think there is a false impression that the CIA makes policy. This is not true."

"I side from playing a direct role in bringing about such a change," Dulles reported, the CIA "would enquire as to the effect of the change, consider likely candidates and try to determine if it would strengthen or weaken South Viet Nam's fight to resist the Communists."

"Those are the type questions the CIA would normally ask — and find answers to — in situations such as that that exists in South Viet Nam," he stated.

Dulles, whose book, "The Craft of Intelligence," will be released next month, commented that the CIA's information on Russia's series of nuclear weapon tests in 1961 was "very good."

Spectacular Test
"Intelligence reports were pretty disquieting," he said. "They showed great progress, especially in very large bombs in the 50-megaton range. It was a spectacular test."

Since his retirement from the CIA post, Dulles has been practicing law in New York City, along with writing his book.

He was visiting his sister while en route from the old family home on Lake Ontario near
